Directions for use

GENERAL REMARKS:

For application, Watercolours have to be diluted in water, if possible previously boiled or distilled, in the required amount, depending on requirements. The more diluted the colour is, the lighter and more transparent the shade will be.

To be usually applied by brush. Concerning brushes, they have to be sharp and they have to keep their shape. Their appearance has to be straight and conical, never belly.

The surface has to be white, clean, grease-free and stable.

Colours give a better optical effect on rough or grained paper, and their adhesion is improved as well.

Watercolours can always be diluted again when dry on the container or palette. White-enamelled palettes are the most suitable because they match the colour of the surface where it is applied.

All colours are compatible with each other. Their mixtures produce an endless variety of exceptionally beautiful shades.

The China white, special for backgrounds, diminish the transparency of the colours mixed with it.
